Frank Moore Accused of Keeping the "Green Light."

DISCRIMINATION IS CHARGED

POLICE ARE SAID TO BE PRO-TECTING FAVORITES.

THE CASE of the state of Utah went to trial in the city court before Judge Diehl yesterday afternoon. At the conclusion of the hearing his honor one inced that he would reserve his decision until Monday. The chief witness against the defendant was Ed C. Penrose, a reporter. Penrose was in the Green Light gam-bling house at the time it was raided, and was a witness of the proceedings inside after a knock at the door had announced the presence of the police outside.

going on, and that when the police knocked on the door Moore gave the orders to cover up the tables and put away the money in the safe. Police officers testified that when Moore was arrested he had told them that the place was his and demanded that they secure a warrant for his arrest.

Employe Tells Different Tale. To controvert the testimony of Pen-ose the defense placed on the stand C. Stahley, an employe of the house. The latter swore that he was the man His memory failed him at frequent in tervals. When asked by Assistant City Attorney Schulder why the money had been placed in the safe, Stahley answered that he did not think it right to leave it lying around on the tables when the whole police force was coming into the room. He was asked several times regarding the amount of money in the safe, and at last sarhere was quite that much there."
With this the prosecuting attorney

then placed on trial on a charge of gaming, Penrose was a witness in this case, and when asked what the crap table in the room looked like, said that as far as he could see, it was a table with a ralling two inches high around it. The railing around the table in question is eleven inches high. Moore was found not guilty of gaming.

No players and no gamblersonly one old man sitting by the fire and reading a newspaper. It may be all right, but I've got a hunch that Mr. Gibson received an informal notice that a fine was to be collected from the house, and that as it would not be proper for the proprietor to his tools and frightened away the burglars. The boys were asleep in a room adjoining the store, but heard the noise made by the burglars in attempting to secure an entrance. Stealthily they crept to the window, where they saw two men engaged in working on the door.

They watched them for some time, until one of the burglars happened to glance up and saw the two faces at the window. With an oath he dropped his tools and field, closely followed by not be proper for the proprietor to come, as in the days of old, to the police station and pay it, a raid by one man would be organized instead. Gibson not being a fool, the tip goes out to the patrons not to come around until the raid has come off. The gamblers don't mind paying fines, but they think that all should be treated alike. Other houses are running absolutely undisturbed."
